Question of policy speech

Sometimes, it's difficult to conduct a policy speech and we may all need a few pointers. A good clean policy speech is similar to giving a persuasive speech in the way that you have to present a particular side of an argument and use persuasive language to make your point. You should also make sure that you've thoroughly researched all the arguments you're about to propose on a topic, otherwise, your speech is unlikely to be effective. First of all, your speech should focus on describing any problems at hand whilst also persuading your listener or audience to take what you're describing seriously. Your audience should be able to grasp why the issue you're proposing in policy speech topics matters to them and you should encourage the audience to think about how to solve any problems you've presented. In this way, you can be sure that the dialogue will flow and the topic will get people thinking – you'll be all set for a good conversation. Once you've outlined and presented the topic at hand and have encouraged your audience to think about the ideas, you can give your personal opinion on the matter. Do you think that this policy is being carried out, or what would you like to see done personally? Is this policy currently effective or harmful to society? Whatever opinions you have, make sure you have conducted ample prior research on the topic so that you can provide an educated opinion and not just an emotional response. Public policy and the law are often controversial topics – it's no wonder that many people say you shouldn't talk about politics because it can lead to a lot of heated argument. However, it's untrue that political debate needs to be silenced. If there are salient points to discuss then why shouldn't we give dialogue a chance? Be tactful and respectful in your approach and try not to offend any people's deep beliefs as best you can, though the line is often fine here. Use your best judgment in all circumstances. Here we combine a list of policy speech ideas that you could use for a compelling speech. They can be used in all sorts of conversations and for all age groups – they're policy speech topics for college students, mature adults, and anyone else willing to have a discussion. Have a think about which ones you'd love to discuss and get passionate about, then go forth and encourage some interesting and thought-provoking dialogue about these persuasive policy speech topics! Confusion is more likely to arise when a persuasive speech presents both sides of an issue where facts are in dispute or evidence is controversial. Such a speech can seem merely informative, particularly to a speaker who firmly believes that one side of the issue is obviously correct. In these cases, the speech should be classified as persuasive based on how controversial this topic is seen by the intended audience given historical and cultural contexts. What follows is an alphabetical list of potential topic areas, including subtopics where applicable. Speeches have further been classified as propositions of value (V), policy (P), or fact (F). In some cases, the proposition shares both value and policy implications. In other cases, the proposition might be seen as a contested fact or as a value to be shared. In these cases, the speech has listed with both (V) and (P) or both (V) and (F), indicating the potential to argue this proposition both as a proposition of value and as a proposition of policy, or as a proposition of value and a proposition of fact. Please note: This list is not meant to replace or contradict any topic guidelines given by your class instructor. When in doubt about a topic, please speak with your instructor to gain approval.
