Adam Crowley/Blend Images/Getty Images There are several rules to remember when writing scientific names; two main principles are to write the name of a plant or organism with two names: a genus or generic name followed by an epithet or a species name. These rules govern the proper naming of plants and animals, regardless of species or kingdom. The act of assigning names to different organisms in a structural way dates back to the 18th-1700s, when the scientist Linnaeus developed a precise method for identifying and classing all living beings. According to Texas A&M University, there are several rules governing the correct writing of both generic names and species. When writing in the bomenclature, the name of the genus is always written first. In addition, it appears underlined or italic. The first letter of the name of the genus should also be capitalized. A specific epithet or species name is written secondly. Like a generic name, the name of a species is underlined or italic. However, unlike a generic name, the first letter of a species name is never capitalized. In addition to standard scientific writing, there are scientific naming systems used to identify mutations (such as different sizes, habitat growth, or color) along with changes in nature. Your independent writing company should not be in the baby steps phase when you start considering your company name. You should already have a semi-clear understanding of the writing services you are going to provide, the general niches you write, and the best business structure for your business. I hope you also served at least a few customers. You'll want to be up-to-snuff about brand identity, too. Not Be an expert and your brand doesn't have to be completely solidified, but you should have a basis before you decide on a name. Name. You have to mull for a few reasons to come up with the right one. There may be a potential hiccup on the horizon when you register your chosen company name in your state or local authorities. Some states may put kibosh on Dr. Editor due to potential abuse of medical title. Contact your state's consumer or business services department to get a handle on the terms there. Think about your future. Perhaps there's a chance that you'll provide advertising services to freelancers five years down the road, or edit freelance instead or in addition to writing. Be wary of including words in your name that will mean only one type of service. Leave yourself a little wiggle to expand and develop. Another look ahead should consider whether to ever sell or move your business. Chances are you don't want your name to go bankrupt with the company if you were offered a million dollars for your unit and customer list. Think of your ideal customer. Are they young, hip-looking to be authors, or are they conservative middle-american businessmen? Do you target cool and trendy marketing agencies that will send you a transfer copy? Make sure your name matches this demographic and service. Get to your name from your customers' point of view and think about what your name might tell them. Your freelance company name should be well matched in the long run. How do you feel about saying this name in your local business mixer in three to five years? You want it to be personal enough that you have warm fuzzies when you think about it, but not so personal and deep that it leaves your colleagues with serious confusion about the brand. And what is fashionable today can be and often is forgotten tomorrow. Don't mark your business with a name that will mark it as a year in the future. First of all, you want people to remember your name. You want to immediately come to mind when you need writing services. Something intricacies and complex may not do that. Potential customers may have problems with this. You can be this writer with a strange company name. But you don't want your name to be generic, either, and it's easy to confuse with countless others. Find the middle ground — not a one-word name, but not six words. Don't get fancy and creative with unusual spelling. You don't want your customers to land on someone else's website when they're looking for you, all because they didn't remember that they used y instead and. Your name should be easy to spell, easy to say and short enough not to get anyone wrong. Take the time to brainstorm your choices, answer the questions here and try your name on the people you trust before you scratch your name on the shingle and hang it over the door. Good luck!
