

1,339 U.S. Colleges Ranked By Average Student Brainpower

Citation: Wai, J. (October, 2014). 1,339 U.S. colleges ranked by average student brainpower. Business Insider, Psychology Today.

There are numerous college rankings, with the most well-known being those released yearly by U.S. News & World Report (e.g., America's Best Colleges, 2015). Different rankings use a variety of different criteria to determine the rank order of schools. However, there has been only one other ranking based strictly on the brainpower of students using a reliable and valid measure of intelligence (Wai & Nisen, 2013), and it was not comprehensive as it only included national universities and national liberal arts colleges in 2013. The purpose of the current ranking was to create a comprehensive list of U.S. colleges and universities strictly based on brainpower—average student body SAT and ACT scores—for the year 2014. This ranking is an extension of Wai \(2014\).

Although there may be different definitions of “brainpower” or “intelligence” the definition used for this ranking is that of general intelligence. Researchers have shown that standardized tests like the SAT and ACT are actually highly reliable and valid measures of general intelligence or g, even though they are often labeled as measures of “academic achievement” (SAT: Frey & Detterman, 2004; ACT: Koenig, Frey, & Detterman, 2008). The 25th and 75th percentile SAT and ACT scores were recorded for each school from the national university, national liberal arts college, regional university, and regional college lists in 2014. ACT scores were translated into SAT scores (math + verbal) using a concordance table (ACT, 2011), so that all schools could be compared using one metric. Finally, an average of the 25th and 75th percentile scores were computed, which resulted in 1,339 schools who had reported SAT or ACT score data according to U.S. News & World Report in 2014.

This ranking of brainpower is the most comprehensive to date, but it still does not include every college or university in the U.S., only those 1,339 schools that reported such data to U.S. News & World Report. Therefore, if a school is not in this ranking but the average SAT or ACT scores are reported elsewhere, this school could easily find their rank in relation to the schools already included. In the current ranking, a (2) next to the school's name indicates that some or all students aren't required to supply scores; a (3) indicates that the school did not supply all students it has scores for, or did not tell U.S. News if it had; a (4) indicates that the data is from a previous year, rather than from the most recent year; and a (9) indicates that the school may not require scores from all applicants and that it may not have submitted data for all students. For each of the schools with one of these qualifications, perhaps with the possible exception of (4), the ranking of the school is likely higher than it should be. Regarding exception (2), if some students aren't required to supply scores, it is typically students with lower scores who fail to report them, which allows schools to report higher SAT or ACT score averages (Wai, 2014). Exceptions (3) and (9) also would likely mean the average SAT or ACT scores reported are higher than if the school had reported scores for all students. This means schools with these exceptions should likely be lower in the current rankings than they presently are, but because it is unclear how much lower, they are still ranked based on the scores they reported.

The current ranking also does not account for sample size, which likely impacts the average brainpower of the student body. For example, large state schools, such as UC Berkeley, likely have a group of students in the right tail of the distribution with similar SAT or ACT scores as some of the top Ivy League and other elite schools (e.g., see discussion in Pinker, 2014), however, their average is lowered by the large number of students with lower scores which are typically admitted. Therefore large state schools, if anything, are likely slightly penalized in the current ranking relative to smaller private schools which draw primarily from top students. It is interesting to note when the U.S. News & World Report rank for national universities and national liberal arts colleges does not align with the “smarts rank.” Overall, national universities and liberal arts colleges tended to be at the top of the current ranking, but not always, and such information may be important for students and parents interested in schools with the highest average concentration of brainpower. In particular, the current ranking highlights many schools which may not be traditionally defined as elite but do an excellent job recruiting a student body with a high average level of brainpower.
