Gaming has a bit of a spotlight at yesterday's WWDC Keynote, and if Apple Apple Just like the show talking about Mac as it did iOS, there are many great mobile phone implications. Game Center The biggest announcement for WWDC players 2012 was a multi-platform platform game center. Allow that Mac owners play with iPhone and iPad owners is a huge step to legitimize mobile games in the eyes of traditional players, but Apple is not barely the first to make this type of move; Microsoft pushed the Xbox Hard brand on Windows Phone, except instead of brushing the PC gap, it is console. We have seen a lot of bubble games from iOS to the desktop, but it will not be long before the iPad and iPhone hardware will be powerful enough to allow the simple migration of Mac games, especially if the Cloud game enters the image. There are some smaller game center updates in iOS 6, including challenges, so you can taunt your friends to beat your high scores, for example. There is also a new In-App Game Center experience that has been mentioned in a slide, but not elaborated on - presumably, will allow players to check at least which of their friends has the game without being started by the app. Even more vague has been a mention of "game groups", which I can only assume means connecting a group of friends together so that they can jump into the Games en masses. Push the Retina resolution The new MacBook Pro is a Retina and Apple Display Display promised that Diablo III was updated with approximately rasaa graphics. The technical wonder of this screen is firmly on the shoulders of the new iPad, which until now has been available the largest retina display. The new iPad alone was not enough to operate anyone outside the iOS development sphere to begin considering high resolutions, but the new Mac Pro will be. This pressure to support Retina resolution on OS X is ultimately good news for iOS, since there will be more developers with activities suitable for the new iPad. While we do not expect a huge resolution jump to the iPhone 5, it is likely that it has a larger screen. The main thing of the retina is that enables scalability; if an app is quite large, it can be crunched up to the small screen, but be rich enough to seem like a shit on the big screen. At this point, Apple must offer only an appropriate TV that can fully use the post-1080P experiences that are enabling, but unfortunately it is one of the many things that we didn't get out of WWDC. AirPlay The WWDC Keynote also introduced some additional AirPlay options for Mac, enabling the complete screens to be played in wireless mode on a TV. pixel-for-pixel. Although iOS has had this for over a year, the new Mac function effectively allows two to fester TV and converge on Apple TV. Also, set the stage for AirPlay between Mac and iOS, which is something we have already seen on the audio side from some intelligent developers. Ultimately, it's easy to imagine you can log in to a live flow of your Mac on your iPad on AirPlay - a teased perspective for anyone in the cloud. At the beginning, it could be limited to local Wi-Fi networks, but in the end, who is to say that you won't be able to touch from external Wi-Fi networks, or cellular networks provided wide bandwidth? Third-party as Splashtop are already doing this kind of thing, but once Apple has entered and offers the same functionality out of the schemes, those guys will have to find something new to offer - perhaps hosted solutions. If this is really the path that Apple is taking, AirPlay on Mac is just the beginning. For any technical limitation it can have the iPhone and iPad, if Apple can provide an airplay experience without High quality continuity to a computer that can handle heavy lifting, games on iOS are going to get a lot of much better. Diablo III on iPad, anyone? Conclusion If there is a single common wire for the relationship between the game and iOS 6, it is Mac. AirPlay will allow Mac and iOS devices to start taking steps towards the competition with the console and e Gaming; Retina grade displays push developers to satisfy a new bar in graphics (not to mention the blow of the players' minds); A Smart Game Center strategy will create a unified social environment for all these games to be made. iOS 6 is only in beta, so we can very well see some other surprises before the iPhone 5 launches in the fall, but for now the future is bright for iOS players. Players, what do you feel you are currently doing more in iOS titles? The burden on Apple to allow developers to fill those gaps, or do that your hands already have full hands trying to get their games up to the quality of the retina, no matter extra things like AirPlay?
